The Intelligencer.

WHEELING, W. VA., JANUARY 11, 1888.

The INTELLIGENCER has gladly given to the men who brought gas to Wheeling the great credit that is their due. Of course they engaged in the enterprise because they expected a profit from it, and of course they are entitled to a handsome profit on so venturesome an undertaking. This the people of Wheeling expected to p sy them, but it was never thought that we should be saked to pay big returns of a combination on watered stock.

So far as concerns the service to manufacturers, the wise precaution which left the way open for compelition and soon brought in a second company was supposed to have provided for a healthful competition. The general service had not been all that was promised. Doubtless the companies have themselves met with some disappointments. But if, as they insist and we believe, there is no shortage of gas but only an engineering defect to remedy, that defect should be promptly remedied and every manufacturing establishment well supplied according to promise.

If now the two companies are to become practically one—whether by actual consolidation or by a pooling agreement matters little, the accept of the pays of the pays of the consolidation or by a pooling agreement matters little, the accept of the consolidation or they accept the pays of th solidation or by a pooling agreement mat-should regret to cee a foot less gas used here than we are using now, but in view of all the circumstances it is a kindness to the companies—it is certainly a duty to our people—to say just what we have said and to advise the companies to weigh it well.

A Fine Opening for Arbitration.

Since the Reading Railroad strike began it has become more and more complicated and far-reaching. From the freight crews it has spread to the mines, until sixty thousand men are out. It is true that they were not perfectly satisfied. They become more perfectly satisfied. They thousand men are out. It is true that the contact of the fairly be raised. The men will not yield, but they are willing to arbitrate.

Thus the matter stands, with 'no more prospect of an adjustment than there was on the first day of the suspension of relations. While there is a standstill as between the company and the men, the results of their disagreement do not stand still. The business of a vast region is practically paralyzed. Another week will throw out of work thousands more whose throw out of work thousands more whose employment stops when the supply of coal stops. These considerations have ng effect on the men or the company.

Works.

Mr. Morton offered to give bonds guaranteeing a saving of 33½ per cent if Mr. Baker would guarantee in turn to give him all the value of the saving over that.

But there is between the combatants the essential difference referred to, that the men are willing to arbitrate and the company is not. President Corbin may be confident of a victory and he may succeed, but meanwhile great public interests are suffering and must suffer more as the present situation lasts and its influence extends. If Mr. Corbin were engaged in an ordi nary private business he might have an absolute right to conduct it as he pleased. In fact, he is engaged in a business for the conduct of which the public has given his corporation exceptional privileges, which involves vast public interests and for the management of which he is responsible in a sense, and an important sense, to public opinion. It may be that from hi point of view, which seems to be a nar row one, there is nothing to arbitrate; but from the public point of view there is something to settle, and in this country public opinion turns with increasing favo to arbitration as the best and most practi cal way of settling such matters. Wage-earners are not always willing to arbitrate; when they are not they forfeit much of the public sympathy, no matter Kerve Restorer. men who work for wages are willing to join a great corporation in the most rational and speedy way of bringing to an end a disagreement of far-reaching consequence, that willingness at once draws the public to their side on that issue.

It matters not why the men are willing and the company unwilling to arbitrate; en the question of arbitration the men are right and the company wrong. Throughout the whole controversy President Corbin has treated the men with scant courtesy, and his haughty disregard of the public interests has been of the ecount of a visit of capitalists and manufacturers from Baltimore and other cities to Disston's Saw Works, at Treeny, Philadelphis, to see a new process of generating and applying a cheap fuel gas.

saight and applying a cheap fuel gas.

In one of the smaller buildings was found the Loomis gas generator. Those who had dome with the idea of seeing a complicated piece of machinery were disappointed. Here was simply a rectangular fron furnace, about twenty feet long, fitteen high and eight across, with its top on a level with the second floor. It was divided into three equal compartments by iron walls running across the eight-foot way. Each compartment had two traps in the top, making six in all.

One wan was allowly feeding the furnaces with itsel consisting of a mixture of anthractic screenings and bituminous slack, the process consisting of simply covering every bright spot where the fire had eaten upward through the mase with a new shovelful of feet. All the traps were open, and no heat was feit, though the burning mass was nine feet deep, and when one of the party accidentally dropped a penell into the furnace the tender. when one of the party accidentally drop-sed a pencil into the furnace the tender bligingly jumped in and recovered it.

The shortest way to explain the operation of the Loomis generator is to say it is the usual water gas generator turned upside down, for instead of using a natural upward draft or foreing air upward through the mass of coal to bring it to about the 1,800 degrees of heat required for water 1,800 degrees of heat required for water 1,800 tegrees of heat required for water water, and is delivered wherever wanted, whether to a furnace or receiver. Thus the one process of carrying off the gas produces the draft, that at Tacony, at present, in the absence of the gas holder, being immediately used in an annealing furnace.

being immediately used in an annealing furnace.
Downstairs were openings in the furnace, where the sahes were raked out, and a small heap of white ashes mingled with small coke cinders was found.
The process by its downward trend carries every residuum through the fire, burns the coal tar and smoke and captures every particle of gas in any gasmaking material fed in from above. Holes covered with mica in the furnace permitted the visitors to see the gas on its course to the main pipe.

solidation or by a pooling agreement matters little—the people of this vicinity will rebel. It may be that there is only talk in all that is being said in Pittsburgh. It may be that the companies will take warning in time. Certain it is that if the screws be put on here there will be a very considerable falling off in the demand for gas in this vicinity. We have done without gas before and we can do without gas again.

The Intelligences does not undervalue the best of all fuel, and it dislikes to think that any combination is on foot which may result as we have indicated. We may result as we have indicated. We the waste heat goes. The workman rolled should regret to see a foot less gas used out all the blooms into thin saw steel, and also true that when the railroad men demanded that the company should not carry freight for the proprietors of an elevator who employed non-union men, they made an unreasonable demand and asked the railroad company to interfere in a matter in which it had no right to interfere. Thus far there was no question of wages involved.

The wage matter came up in the mines, the men demanding an advance and the company insisting that under its contract with the men no wage question could fairly be raised. The men will not yield.

They ordered two gasholders of twenty and thirty thousand feet capacity, respectively, which they have countermande ively, which they have countermanded for one of over one hundred thousand feet, and they expect to furnish heat and light to the ectlement of Tacony, besides using the gas allogether in their factory.

Mr. Bakor, of Baltimore, said he was perfectly satisfied that the purity and power of the heat was all sufficient for his klass-amelting, and after he had saified himself beyond doubt of its cheapness, he would recommend its use at his firm's works.

The railroad connections of this city being extended and new and important transportation enterprises are constantly coming to light. The contributory territory of Baltimore is also being rapidly developed. J. J. Burns, a prominent West Virginian, was at the Howard House today, on his way home from Washington, where he went to consult with representatives from New Tork and London capitalists who are in negotiation for the purchase of 16,200 scress of valuable coal lands, which are as yet undeveloped. These lands lie between the main stem of the Baltimore & Ohio ralirozal and New Martinsville, in Welzal county, on the Ohio river. These capitalists also expect to become largely interested in the development of other West Virginia resources.

Mr. Burns, while in this city, has been in conference with the Hon. Henry G. Davis, the President, and the Hon. Johnson N. Camden, of Parkersburg, ene of the directors of the West Virginia Central Ralirozal, which is practically a Baltimore road, and he has, he says, been assured that the construction of a railroad, fityone miles long, which has already been surveyed, to connect Fairmont with New Martinsville, will be begun as soon as spring opens.
